Collaboration can be tricky, especially in the art world. With artistic egos in the mix, working with others can be a disaster, or a headache at the very least. Collaboration with Dominick Lombardi, however, is a joy. He is kind, smart and generous, and many thanks go to him for proposing this exhibition, writing the essay and selecting the bulk of the artists for the show. As for our other collaborators, thanks also to Kelsey Nagy, who rules the details of each exhibition, keeping us all on track. Undying gratitude to the faithful Betsy Orbe Lester and Tom Kaltenbaugh, who make all of our shows look stunning. And finally, thank you to the artists in the exhibition (25 plus from 9 states!) who were willing to tackle this important contemporary issue and share their vision with our community.

Water Over the Bridge: Contemporary Seascapes

Climate Change is as real as the political battle is to deny it. The data is overwhelming. In an October 21, 2009, open letter to United States Senators from the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which at the time cited 18 separate scientific organizations including the Association of Ecosystem Research Center; the Ecological Society of America; the American Chemical Society; the University Corporation for Atmospheric Research and the American Meteorological Society; stated that "Observations throughout the world make it clear that climate change is occurring, and rigorous scientific research demonstrates that the greenhouse gases emitted by human activities are the primary driver."

In a June 11, 2015 article in the Guardian, Susan Goldenberg writes: "Oklahoma senator James Inhofe, who now chairs the Senate environment and public works committee despite famously calling global warming 'the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people,' took a star turn on Thursday at the Heartland Institute, whose conferences function as a hub for climate deniers. His message—that 'God is still up there' and that Pope Francis should mind his own business—sent a clear signal to his fellow conservatives: climate skeptics have a loyal—and newly powerful—friend in Congress." More recently, President Donald J. Trump announced "We're Getting Out" of the Paris Accord, eliminating any federal restrictions on damaging and dangerous carbon emissions created by utilities and businesses here in the U.S.

Regardless of the side of the aisle you stand politically, it is almost impossible not to notice water levels rising due to the melting polar caps. And it is getting harder and harder to predict the extreme changes in weather events and their surprising new locations. I have personally witnessed three different tornadoes come through Westchester County in the last 20 years, one just missing my home, and that is just not normal. Yet, there is an intensely contentious political divide. There is and always will be big business prodding politicians with their sizable contributions to keep the oil flowing, the fracking going and the coal burning as long as there are humans willing to consume.

On the other hand, contemporary artists can very often be like the canary in the coal mine warning of the presence of deadly gases. Artists can bring to light the changes in sea levels, and the industries that contribute to the problem by simply exposing, with visual and written references, a very troubling reality that we are in the thick of a political battle for our very future, and the futures of the animals and plants we love. We must know and express what is going on. It is necessary to be aware of what we, and our forthcoming generations will inevitably come to face if we continue on our current destructive path. We can never compete directly, one-on-one, with powerful big business, and the legislation and legislators they finance, but we can spread the word by contacting our local legislators and expressing our concerns.

For this exhibition, we have selected a number of artworks that reveal the changes in the contemporary seascape. Pictures can open eyes and the best, and most prominent place to start is our seas and waterways. This is where things are happening quickly, this is where it is obvious and tangible and this is the focus of Water Over the Bridge: The Art of the Contemporary Seascape.
